Whether the analysis is added manually or semi-automatically, it is ultimately based on native speaker judgments. (Treebanks are often developed by graduate student annotators tutored by computational linguists; naturally, consistency between annotators is an issue that needs regular attention. See Artstein and Poesio, 2008, for discussion of the methodological issues.).

Speaking of Europe, much has been written on how regional dialects there are dying out since they're not taught in schools and people relocate across regions, causing the "generic" mode of speech to dominate. The US is no different. Americans born in the 70's and later are less likely to have as strong a local accent as their parents and grandparents. This is because the younger generations ...
